SEPTEMBER MEETING

Alice Ewing - Otways Conservation Dogs program

A team of community volunteers has been trained to work with their own dogs to detect scats of endangered species. Minimal Impact Detection Methods are used to detect scats on both private and public land throughout the Otways (and beyond!). Initially, the aim was to train conservation detection dogs to locate Tiger Quoll scats (rediscovered in the Otways in 2012). In 2015, dogs positively identified an old quoll scat in the Cumberland Valley. From 2017 dogs are being trained to detect Long-nosed Potoroos.

OCTOBER MEETING

Jane Turner - Biomimicry in Architecture

Jane is an architect and Australia's first Certified Biomimicry Professional. She is the founder of Biomimicry Australia and one of the co-founders of the Melbourne Living Future Collaborative. Jane is passionate about the potential of Biomimicry to contribute to designs that are environmentally regenerative, socially just and joyous. She is a strong advocate for the integration of biomimicry at the earliest stage of a project and sees playfulness and intra-disciplinary collaboration as the keys to successful sustainable design outcomes.

Once Bittern, Twice Shy

'Rolf Boldrewood' was the pen-name used by Thomas Alexander Browne (1826-1915) when he wrote "Robbery under Arms." His father bought the Hartlands property on Mt. Eagle in 1839, when he was 13. This must have included part of what is now the Yarra Flats Park. In 1908, as an old man, he wrote in The Australasian of the Yarra River:

"How changed are the woods and fields and the reed-fringed lagoons which in earlier days followed its winding course. The girdling reed-beds which sheltered the wild-fowl have disappeared before the encroaching live-stock. A bare pond-like outline alone remains where once lay the mysterious mere – haunt of the Bittern, the Heron, the Ibis, and the Pied Wild Goose."

This quotation was included in an early issue of the WCS Newsletter – December 1970. We now know the Pied Wild Goose as the Magpie Goose. During the 19th Century, it was exterminated in southern Australia – it was believed to compete with stock for grass - but it has been successfully re-introduced at Serendip, where it is breeding, and it is quite often seen in the western suburbs. The Australasian Bittern has been so affected by wetland drainage that it is now an endangered species. On a recent visit to Braeside Park, Daphne Hards and I were delighted to see one beside a large reedbed – I was very lucky to get a photo before it withdrew into the reeds and became invisible. Their shyness and camouflage makes them very hard to see. Apparently at least one pair, possibly two, are resident at Braeside. Lucky winter visitors to Werribee's Western Treatment Plant may also see one. Later that day our party moved on to Edithvale Swamp, where some observers saw a Magpie Goose. This shows that it is beginning to spread eastward. I missed seeing it, so my photo was taken at Serendip.

Recent Guest Speakers

July - John Morgan - Native Grasslands

John spoke about the native grasslands of Melbourne, noting that the volcanic plains of Melbourne are the third largest in the world. Trees were rare due to frequent fires, a practice used by indigenous Australians to manage the land to favour plants producing tubers. Von Mueller considered the area boring and dull, but it is home to a great diversity of animals and plants. The area is/was home to bandicoots, quoll, broilgas, legless lizards, and the Golden Sun-moth amongst other species. Development has destroyed much of the grassland and many of the species that rely on it are gone or just hanging on. The Sunshine Diuris is a white orchid that was once extremely abundant, but now survives as a handful of specimens.

August - Nikki Kowalczyk - Yarra Keepers

Nikki explained that the Yarra River keeper organisation has two paid employees, a board and number of volunteers. The keepers work to maintain the health of the Yarra. The Yarra begins near Mt Baw Baw and the upper reaches are in relatively good health. The lower reaches of the Yarra score badly for measures of river health. Pollution, runoff and plastic are some of the main problems. The keepers work to help the public appreciate the abundance of animal and plant life the Yarra supports, and understand the processes that threaten river health. They are increasingly working in schools to make children aware of how rubbish makes its way into the river and the problems it causes.

Duck Season 2017

According to notes for the 2017 duck hunting season by Victoria's Game Management Authority (GMA) (www.gma.vic.gov.au/hunting/duck/duck-species), the Freckled Duck is protected in all states and territories and must not be shot. Yet 143 Freckled Ducks were shot and left to die on one wetland alone near Kerang this season. They were found by volunteer bird lovers.

The Blue-Winged Shoveler was also on the list of legally protected birds from the GMA this year. According to the GMA notes, the Blue-Winged Shoveler cannot be shot. Yet 40 Blue-Winged Shovelers were shot and left to die on the same wetland near Kerang this duck shooting season. They were also found by volunteer bird lovers.

Victoria has twenty thousand wetlands where hunters can legally shoot during the three month duck shooting season. Many more than 143 Freckled Ducks and 40 Blue-Winged Shovelers must have died painfully and needlessly on our wetlands during the 2017 Victorian season. Many, many more native ducks would have had painful and unnecessary deaths as well. Duck Hunting is indefensible.
